What is Drug Abuse?

Drug abuse is the detrimental use of psychoactive substances.

These substances include alcohol and illegal drugs.

Drug abuse does not necessarily mean addiction.

It refers to the repeated misuse of substances that can lead to harmful consequences, even if the person is not physically dependent on them.

Factors for Drug Abuse

01

Societal

Seeking acceptance from peers. Socializing in environments where drug use is normalized.

02

Environmental

Easy access to drug in the environment. Availability in social settings or within communities.

03

Personal

Using drug as a way to cope with stress or challenges. Self-medicating for mental health issues.

Different Ways to Help

01 Education and Awareness

Conduct educational programs to raise awareness about the risks and consequences of drug abuse.

Providing accurate and accessible information about drugs, their effects, and the signs of addiction equips individuals to make informed choices and identify potential problems.

02 Building Empathy

Foster supportive environments within families, schools, and communities.

Drug abuse can lead to feelings of isolation and loneliness. A strong support system provides individuals with a sense of belonging and connection.

03 Coping Skills Development

Drug abuse often becomes a coping mechanism for dealing with negative emotions.

By developing healthy coping skills, individuals learn alternative ways to manage these emotions without resorting to drugs or alcohol.
